

THE NAKED SINGULARITY

The Last One!

Another year is ending, another class is graduating, and another long donut famine is about to fall upon Robeson hall. You don't realize how important that biweekly dose of rambling conversation, sugar, and caffeine is until it's gone. Give it two weeks and I bet all of you will be eyeing the walls for announcement posters and checking the lounge for big white Carol Lee boxes. As for me, Thursday (or in this case Wednesday) nights will no longer be spent on google images and I will have one less outlet for my rambling.

SPS had a productive and fun year and is showing signs of being even better next year. In the fall we had video game nights, t-shirt designing sessions, and events for new and prospective members that have filled our ranks with quite a few motivated underclassmen (those t-shirts are still around and a few of you still need to pick them up).

Come spring the diverse ranks of SPS came back to Chez Robeson planning, cooking, and performing all while meeting students from the other classes and ensuring a strong membership for next semester. If the potluck last Sunday was any indication of what is to come Dr. Vogelaar's collection of awesome lawn games and general outdoor frolicking will be popular mainstays of SPS events.

Despite the longing we'll all feel let's enjoy our summer jobs, vacations, and random responsibilities with whatever brand of donut our current situation provides. If this is your last coffee and donuts in the foreseeable future good luck in your endeavors and may there always be a good donut shop nearby When next year comes around we'll have a new squad running the place, which means a new voice behind this publication as well! Help him out and save anything you write this summer.

it's been real,

^Caption Contest^

Well not really contest, more like game. Write your own captions and leave them around the lounge. Provide some poor studier with a brief moment of laughter... or confusion. Both are cool.

Save My Homework!!!

A SATIRICAL JAB AT HOMEWORK STRESS BASED ON THE FIRE ALARM GOING OFF IN ROBESON

Tragedy struck today as four physics students and three professors were critically injured during a fire in Robeson Hall. Reports suggest that it was packing up the homework they had been working on in the SPS lounge which prevented them from leaving in time.

After questioning why the value of their homework might be in any way comparable to that of their lives an indignant undergraduate exclaimed "Is that even a question? I've been working on that E&M homework since last Tuesday! And I had to meet with Pleimling five times before I could even get that far in my mechanics!" Other students involved in the incident appeared to have denied there being any imminent danger to begin with. "Just because the fire alarm was going off, the probability distribution of there actually being a fire still didn't collapse until I observed the flames outside the SPS lounge door."

Some university professors reported difficulties leaving their office due to the smorgasbords of students blockading their way out. "It certainly was unfortunate timing that I was holding office hours and that it was the day of the General Relativity homework being due when the fire occurred" reported Professor Sharpe. "I was able to get past most the undergraduates without too much difficulty, but after I traversed the first wave there were still grad students trying to get help on problems too." Concerned about the student's reactions our on-scene reporter asked how they planned to handle the situation next time. One student responded "well, the fireman pulled me out before I had a chance to grab my E&M book from the table. So I would be sure to get that next time, if given the chance."
